The Libra Reader

Simply a place to hear about books and authors, both the good and the bad.

Now that summer is here, and Novel Theology is on break, I'd like to introduce you to a new blog, by our own sexton, Kenneth, that will keep your toe in the literary world. Maybe he will inspire you to pick up a book this season, or maybe new selections will be added to the Novel Theology list for the fall.

The Libra Reader is a weekly blog, reviewing award winning books. Kenneth follows several different literary awards. In this blog, he shares his thoughts about the individual works and how they relate to others by the same author, and by other award winners- good, bad and indifferent. He is not shy about sharing his feelings, and as an avid bibliophile he pulls from a strong background of many genres.

In the first issue of this new blog, Kenneth reviews books that have won the newest literary award: The Gotham Book Prize. Learning about this prize was an added treat! His descriptions of characters and what they go through bring them to life. These will fast become people you want to meet and learn their stories. I highly recommend subscribing to this blog. I suspect many of us will immediately log into the library to reserve copies of Deacon King Kong by James McBride and Invisible Child by Andrea Elliott.

Visit the below website and subscribe to Kenneth's blog. If you are like me, you will be looking forward to Tuesday when the next issue drops! I hear we will be going on a journey back to Tudor times with author Alison Weir.
